

ACCESS THE AKASHIC

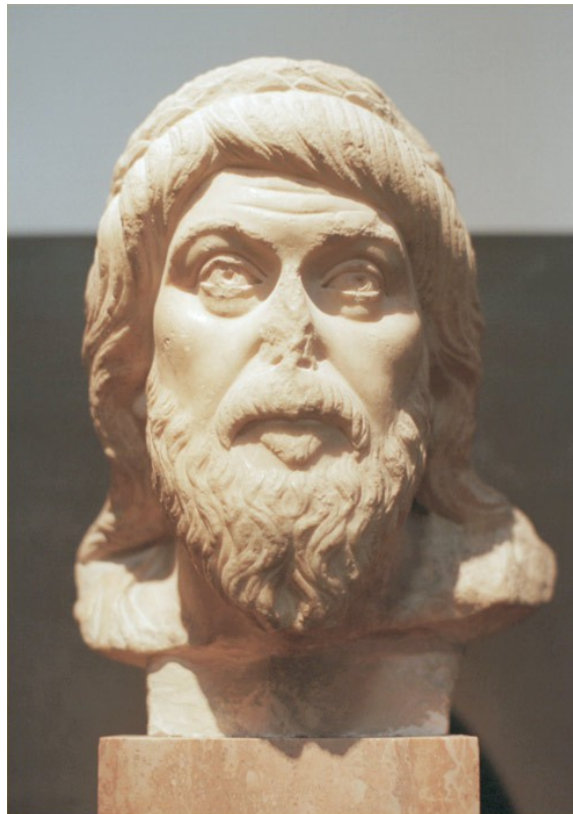

A Weekly Zine Released Every Tuesday

Contact: mail@nxxs.org

20th Issue / February 10, 2015

Proclus: The Man Who Saw Every Initiation

He saw each and every Initiatory Rite of the past and held firmly to his oath of secrecy. Let us now look at some things about him and his life that are not publicly known, as this is a clairvoyant, occult overview of Proclus' life and magic. This reading was performed today and took about an hour to read through, while the astral soul alongside unlocked Tarot (rota) communed with higher principles to decipher various occult messages as they appear to the lower substance of the normal life. Without the kabalaa of the magicians it is not easy to hold to a firm footing while approaching the more subtle region of the so-called akashic records (although we know them now to be easier to access, because the meaning is demystified by the hierarchical learning of H.P. Blavatsky's occult sciences, reduced and reiterated by her for the masses of the world from pagan sources).

Let us proceed to the reading. He was jailed for some while, but they let him go. Let us go on a journey into the power of Initiation and Sacred Rites. He is the 'last of the Mohicans' if you understand the saying. He could see the seven quaternaries before the stages. The whole thing made sense to Proclus. Do you follow this? Let's move along.

He had an occult ritual that he could not speak of, otherwise the overseers would find him, and fast. It was something that he kept hidden within. It is time for the world to know these things and not just what the mundane written history tells us. Proclus said in his heart, "I am as flesh and bone. I am naked before the MASTER." And the ritual was sealed with an oath before the judges. Proclus says, "They made it very clear as to my obligations." Withhold in secrecy these things at all times to find the right path. To make the world a more just place and give equality to all humans. He is in agreement with NXXS, as he says, "promote awareness of my soul to the world." He wrote many things that should yet be studied by the author of Access the Akashic.

"Await the INTERPOLATOR and he will deceive you until you see the decoding of his foul words." They did not have to be there present with him in order to see him. They could watch him from a distance. He was heard about by many people. He had financial ability, and great physical energy and athletic ability, with average to slightly above-average strength. Proclus also had a great sense of mystery and depth of spirit. He possessed great awe and wonder for the real science.

The Initiator spoke into his bosom the nouns, verbs and pronouns of great MYSTERY. He could understand it all with wonder. Yet to the outside world he appeared like anyone else, but he had great wisdom regarding the things of the mysteries. He never put on display any theurgic abilities although in possession of them.

He had a handful of students. He had a garden. He made people gifts. He helped in shipments of belongings as an income. There was no other person from his time that was so deeply initiated. He knew he would be reincarnated into another life. So much thought and knowledge surrounds Proclus.

Now here is something interesting that came through the reading towards the last portion of the clairvoyant working. There is a mysterious plant substance that Proclus had the knowledge of its proper administration and mystical usage. Surprisingly it is not one of the well-known psychoactive substances that at the time of the reading the author could not identify. The properties, the effects, and other variables have been described during the clairvoyant session with diagrams as well, but still there is not a single plant that comes to mind—or more accurately—lines up with the reading. He had this growing in his garden. There is some danger in revealing this, because the natural people do not know the difference between recreation and proper spiritualistic usage of herbs and such substances that are found in nature. There is also the good chance that even if it were to be utilized exactly as Proclus himself did so, that in fact, the effects will not be the same since we live in a different era. Matter is in constant motion, thus some substances and plant effects may change over time, etc.

This is being researched during the course of the Tuesday on which Access the Akashic is generally being written altruistically for the sake of Madame Blavatsky's goals and the strong spiritual link between her, many great seers and sages from the pagans and also myself.

With that being said, all is well, even if the exact plant species is not revealed or ever understood. A magician of Proclus' adept ability, would not exactly utilize a substance without total knowledge of magic, sympathies, proper preparations and keen knowledge for the astrologico-spiritualism behind anything of this sort, and NXXS strongly advises against embibing for the sake of fun or impractical beliefs about life, the universe and its various entities. He would make a soup of it, go to sleep and it wakes you up. The herb would produce an amnesiac / occult vision and then it would describe the mystic eye to the person. But what is it? No it is not ergot. It is possibly yellowish. What is it known by now? <This is the clairvoyant session's notes transcribed.> No it is not mandrake. It is the stems. It tastes strong, sort of tart or sour and sweetener had to be added to it. It put you into a cataleptic stupor. It would open the hidden senses (this effect probably extended solely to those initiated). It is a shrub. It was plentiful then. It may still be plentiful, although we do not have the modern name for it yet. It has a toxic side that you have to watch for, as the hierophant instructed on its safe uses to never venture off to the mental/spiritual region where it could seriously harm you. So you never take it on a full moon.

After some research, the clairvoyant of this article believes the herb to be Aconitum lycoctonum, the yellow variety of Monk's hood or wolfbane. As an example, in order to instruct, clairvoyance itself is a tricky art indeed. In depth and in wisdom, you must master the participles of relative language and then the symbolic sort used in this procedure. To further clarify, the master said "I-L-C-G-D" among other things, based on the cards in the occult working, not black magic, but just Pythagorean science, and this was the clairvoyant result of the name of the plant before it was discovered. As you can see this does not exactly spell out the name, yet in occult usage and astral vision it is how things go, so now you have an example. It is not simple, yet it is very clear. But the reality is far beyond ours, and so things are such as in a mirror looking darkly inward, yet with practice it becomes the normal way of seeing it. The other details of the reading/working/Tarot show the plant in various ways: it's bush/shrub-like appearance, the oddly shaped roots, the flowers' shape, etc. They are not exact and that is exactly how a clairvoyant must work through the oddness of astral forms. With the method employed, it is possible to double and triple check for redundancy and error correction.

The reading showed John that the shrub now grows in Turkey, that a few grimoires had mentioned it in the middle ages (or maybe more than a few), the bulging roots are what is used in the procedure. That it is not recreational at all! (emphasis here). That it is a process. Approach it with dignity and it will teach you anything. This information gathered from the second layout, solely done for the purpose of uncovering this plant, was enough to build upon while searching internet for the match, using techniques of elimination. For example, it is not a tulip, it is not a poppy, it is not a lily, it is not a type of hibiscus and so on. You cannot be 100% literal and logically dry with seeing through time and space into the oneness because of the nature of our phenomenal world and its beast are not what they seem. Those with a background in the noumenal occultism will already know the ways of THOTH. Thank you for reading. It is a pleasure to serve you with information unavailable anywhere else for many days to come. Please read more and be sure to write with information or questions on any subject at all times, places or natures. Give H.P. Blavatsky a chance and do her a favor by reading the books from her pen. Be well and be advised that Aconitum is poison and you will not get a vision if you use it. The proper method is stored far far away in the regions of boundlessness. That if you were to know such things, you would also not need to use it.

These words may be modified from their original content at a later date and time because of the nature of clairvoyance and its susceptibilities to interference by the material realm and its subdued refraction. Noumenal Extrasensory Existent Society/JPG

